A bush abuzz with bees

12 May 1993

Bees swarm a lilac bush in the front yard of Connie Smith's Salt Lake home. Perhaps taking advantage of sunny weather after a week of rain, the bees gathered in the yard for the second day in a row. Lilac bushes at this time of year are a favorite target of the busy insects.

help protect their rights by filing violations they witness. A little bit of enforcement and education would solve our problem," said Jay Bowers of Provo. He said the county should be concerned about the direct shooting than about disease. However, Utah County's David Bateman said state

"If we don't provide some alternatives, we're just going to make everyone a criminal," said Jim Johnson of Orem. County officials will hold two more public hearings on the proposed ordinance, Monday, May 17, in Lehi and Tuesday, May 18, in Payson. Both hearings will start at 6:30 p.m. Locations will be announced at Wednesday's commission meeting.

They think that somewhere they have been Zion National Park as the land — and they want to keep the rest of us out." He said members of the group, which calls itself the Army of the Holy Land, have told reporters they intend to hang a banner in the park or demonstrate with loaded weapons — although they have

WESTSIDE

In the past 11 months studying various issues with as little government intervention as possible. That time, it came up with a plan for the area that includes 80 recommendations regarding land use, housing, transition, environment and public services. The plan is interim until incorporated in the city's general plan in the next few years. The Planning Commission approved the 56-page document Tuesday. The City Council will consider it May 25. The task force suggested the city expand its urban boundary and decrease by 27 percent the amount of land suggested in the city's general plan. A seven-block area from 1000 North to 1820 South should be used for housing more than 3.5 units per acre. To control growth at the airport, the city has plans for an office park, should be capped acres along 3110 West until roads are built, according to the committee. The plan calls for 44 percent less manufacturing use than does the 1990-year-old general plan. Development should be sensitive to existing wetlands. Because of the low cost of westside land, developers have their eye on it for new subdivisions. The task force recommends a mixture of housing types, prices and density. It encourages developers to build where sewer lines, waterlines and roads are already in place. Airport expansion, recreational opportunities, light industrial uses and housing have brought more traffic to west Provo. As the area continues to grow, the street network should be developed to foster safe and orderly movement. Task force suggestions include widening Geneva Road from Center Street north to the city limits; widen the Center Street viaduct to five lanes; a five-lane arterial on 3110 West between Center Street and 1800 North and another arterial from the University Avenue interchange on I-15 curving northwest to 1020 South and the airport. The plan calls for emergency service providers to be able to respond to the west side in five minutes or less, something the task force says they currently can't do.

it (recycling) mandatory, and reduce the ($3) charge. The charge per home would dramatically go down," Gunn said. Provo residents are provided with bins, while Orem residents pay $10 for their recycling. Probably won't be mandatory Jones said it is unlikely mandatory recycling will be adopted in Utah because of the cost. "The (the government) don't like to impose fees on people," he said. Stewart Cowley, manager of Utah County Solid Waste, said, "You have to provide a system that it is easy. Most people recycle only when we make it easy for them." Gunn said states with mandatory recycling usually have higher fees at landfills to subsidize recycling. But, with increased recycling, the waste stream
